Trained at the Lycée Octave Feuillet, a French school of feather work, Julien Vermeulen holds a BTS in Fashion Design and a degree in Visual Arts and Art Sciences. Since 2015, he has collaborated with prestigious fashion and jewellery houses including Dior, Givenchy, Lanvin, Schiaparelli, Repetto and Bulgari.

Winner of the prestigious Liliane Bettencourt Foundation Prize in 2018 for “Intelligence of the Hand – Exceptional Talents”, the designer has been represented by maison parisienne since 2020 which, in January of the same year, exhibited his work for the first time at the Hôtel Solvay in Brussels.

In 2021, the Black Gem goose and pheasant feather wall panel joined the collections of the Musée des Arts Décoratifs in Paris. In 2022, the Mobilier National Museum in Paris also acquired one of his pieces as part of the exhibition “Les Aliénés”: the Eden console, which evokes a lost paradise. Reinterpreting an Empire style furniture piece, Julien Vermeulen replaced the mirror with a panel representing a landscape of moss and leaves from which the silhouette of a black feathered snake with blue tinted reflections emerges surreptitiously.

REDEFINING THE FEATHER

Julien Vermeulen discovered the feather as an artistic medium in 2013 during an internship with fashion designer Jean-Paul Gaultier. He was amazed to see how, through the interplay of dyes and cutaways, goose feathers could be used to create a trompe l'oeil leopard pattern. This is how his vocation was born.

Trained in the traditional techniques of feather work, Julien Vermeulen has acquired an exceptional level of craftsmanship that he continues to transcend and modernise.

He grants the feather daring innovations, by using ancient, manual tools of the utmost simplicity: a pair of scissors, a trimming knife, a curling knife, tweezers... not to mention a machine designed to make steam dating from the Napoleonic era.

To begin his process, peacock, ostrich, goose and pheasant feathers are meticulously selected and sorted. No two feathers are identical, so Julien Vermeulen identifies their natural imperfections to create what he terms “a harmony of defects”.

They are then carefully steamed and reshaped before the artist determines their transformation according to his inspiration and the desired effect.

The feathers can be burned, curled, coloured, woven and glued to become artworks, wall panels, sculptures and decorative ornaments. Each unique piece reveals its own texture, a subtle combination of lightness and density.

AN ARTISTIC APPROACH

Julien Vermeulen's modes of expression are incredibly varied which leads to great experimentation. His collaborations with ultimate worlds of luxury, haute couture & jewellery, enable him to imagine works of pure refinement. The feather master also enjoys designing projects for institutions as diverse as the Lido and the Comédie Française, culminating in true artistic achievements.

For example, for the Toguna space at the Palais de Tokyo in Paris in 2017, the artist created Black Ocean, a 20m² wall made up of more than 12,000 hand-cut turkey feathers, coloured with Indian ink and then glued one by one in just 15 days (i.e. 1,000 working hours). This feat was honoured with the Bettencourt Prize for "Intelligence of the Hand" in 2018.

CONTEMPORARY ART IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Regardless of the medium or format, Julien Vermeulen sketches each work with a few strokes of an acrylic felt-tip pen before starting a long process of application in order to create a movement, to capture a radiance while remaining abstract with a degree of the monochrome. The pen then becomes a pigment that he adds.

Julien Vermeulen is inspired by some of the great masters of modern art such as Kasimir Malevitch, Mark Rothko, Yves Klein, Lucio Fontana and Pierre Soulages.

Julien Vermeulen's latest creation will be proudly showcased on maison parisienne's stand at PAD Paris and PAD London in 2023.

Entitled Echoes of Infinity, the mural is made up of 6 panels that can be read separately. Fascinating and enigmatic, the work enhances black and white through the play of lighting, scale and contrast.
